Undeniably, the new digital age has redefined America and shifted the landscape for social justice advocacy for black communities. More and more individuals receive their information through social media and advocates have developed new strategies to communicate their work through multi-media platforms and online organizing strategies. Over the last decade, new civil rights issues have emerged for advocates including: access to broadband support; diversity in the technology sector; education and coding; and federal media policy reform.

This webinar will explore the growing role philanthropy and advocates can play to secure media justice and how technology has shaped a new frontier for organizing and advocacy in the black community.
